

In 2005, the United Nations designated January 27th—the date of the liberation of Auschwitz—as an annual international day of commemoration of the Holocaust. In recognition of this day, CONGRESS MONTHLY offers two articles dealing with less familiar aspects of the Jewish story of the Shoah, followed by two very different personal stories of survival.

Jewish Survival in Albania & the Ethics of 'Besa'

Shirley Cloyes DioGuardi

Very few people know about the long history of Albanian religious tolerance and resistance to oppression. Neither do they know that during World War II, all Jews who lived in Albania or sought asylum in that country were saved from the ravages of the Holocaust. This information was suppressed by the Stalinist Communist regime of Enver Hoxha, who controlled Albania for 50 years.

When European Jewry began fleeing to Albania to escape the unfolding events in Western Europe in the early 1930s, there were approximately 200 Jews living in Albania. (Archaeological evidence documents the presence of Jews in Albanian lands since the epoch of Roman rule.) At the end of World War II, there were close to 2,000 Jews living in Albania—the only nation that can claim that every Jew within its borders was rescued from the Holocaust.

One witness to the lack of anti-Semitism in Albania was Herman Bernstein, himself a Jew, who served as U.S. Ambassador to Albania from 1930 to 1933. Bernstein wrote in his letters that:

There is no trace of any discrimination against Jews in Albania because Albania happens to be one of the rare lands in Europe today where religious prejudice and hate do not exist, even though Albanians themselves are divided into three faiths....¹

¹*The Jewish Daily Bulletin*, New York, vol. XI, no. 2821, April 17, 1934.

THE fact that Albanians had been isolated from centuries of institutionalized anti-Semitism in Western Europe was a factor in this remarkable record. However, the principal reason for Albanians saving Jews was their history of religious tolerance based on the Kanun and its underlying moral code of besa.

In the words of Mehmet Hysref Frasheri, a descendant of one of the most influential families in the political history of Albania who rescued Jews from the Nazi Holocaust, "People in Albania are not surprised; they thought that it was normal to save Jews." His statement is echoed by Beqir Qoqja, a 93-year-old who today lives in the same house as he did when his family sheltered Avraham Eliasaf, aka Avram Gani, from 1943 to 1944. "I have always been a devout Muslim," Qoqja told fine-art photographer Norman Gershman in a 2004 interview. "We did nothing special; all Hebrews are our brothers and sisters."

Muslim and Christian Albanians not only

... [I]N THE EARLY 1930s, THERE WERE APPROXIMATELY 200 JEWS LIVING IN ALBANIA. . . . AT THE END OF THE WAR, THERE WERE CLOSE TO 2,000 JEWS LIVING IN ALBANIA—THE ONLY NATION THAT CAN CLAIM THAT EVERY JEW WITHIN ITS BORDERS WAS RESCUED FROM THE HOLOCAUST.

risked their lives to save Jews, but no incident has been found where they accepted compensation. When Avram Gani offered to recompense Beqir Qoqja for sheltering him, Qoqja refused, telling him that “Albanians give besa to a friend, but never sell it.”

Although the Kanun contains an oft-publicized, abhorrent, but now archaic set of injunctions for carrying out blood feuds, it is primarily a collection of Albanian customary laws that covers and regulates all aspects of conduct within one’s family, village, and clan, with members of other clans, and with complete strangers. The Kanun has been the foundation of Albanian society over centuries and, as Professor Leonard Fox has written in his superb introduction to his 1989 English translation of the Kanun, it is an “expression and reflection of the Albanian character.”²

Besa, which inextricably links personal honor and respect for and equality with others, is the foundation of the Kanun. Besa has multiple meanings, ranging from faith, inviolable trust, truce, and word of honor to a sacred promise and obligation to keep one’s word to provide hospitality and protection. It involves uncompromising protection of a guest, even to the point of forfeiting one’s own life.

For example, Book 8, Chapter 18, of the Kanun, which deals with “social honor,” opens with the maxim that “the house of an Albanian belongs to God and to the guest.” It continues by stating that “A weary guest must be received and surrounded with honor. The feet of a guest are washed.” “Every guest must be given the food eaten in the house.” And, upon entering the house, the guest “must give you his weapon to hold as a sign of guardianship, since after you have said, ‘Welcome,’ he must have no fear and know that you are ready to defend him against any danger.” The Kanun “demands that a guest should be accompanied . . . lest he be the victim of some wicked act.” “If someone mocks your guest or abuses him, you must defend your guest’s honor, even if your own life is in danger.”

THE modern Western concept of “foreigner” does not exist in the Kanun, only the concept of the guest.³ Hence, there were no Jewish “foreigners” in Albania during World War II—only Jewish “guests,” who had to be sheltered and protected even at the risk of Albanian lives.

THE MODERN WESTERN CONCEPT OF “FOREIGNER” DOES NOT EXIST IN THE KANUN, ONLY THE CONCEPT OF THE GUEST. HENCE, THERE WERE NO JEWISH “FOREIGNERS” IN ALBANIA DURING WORLD WAR II—ONLY JEWISH “GUESTS,” WHO HAD TO BE SHELTERED AND PROTECTED EVEN AT THE RISK OF ALBANIAN LIVES.

The story of Ali Alia, the owner of a general store in Puka, illustrates dramatically the extent to which Albanians went to save Jewish lives.

In 1943, a German transport carrying 19 Albanian prisoners on their way to hard labor and one Jew who was to be shot, stopped outside Alia’s store. Sizing up the situation, Alia, who spoke excellent German, invited the Nazis into his store, offered them food, and plied them with wine until they were drunk.

While they were drinking, Alia convinced the Nazis that he should give the prisoners some food. He handed the young Jewish prisoner a piece of melon. In it, Alia had concealed a note instructing him to flee into the woods and to wait for him at a designated place.

When the Nazis got ready to leave Alia’s establishment, they discovered that the Jewish prisoner was missing and erupted in fury. They dragged Ali Alia into the village square and pinned him against a wall. Four times the Germans put a gun to his head, but he continued to maintain his innocence.

Abruptly they left to search for the Jewish prisoner. When they returned empty-handed, they threatened to burn the village down if Alia did not confess. He did not, and finally the Germans left Puka for good. Alia retrieved the Jewish prisoner, whose name was Yasha Bayuhovio, and hid him in his home for two years until the war was over. (Today he is a dentist living in Mexico.)⁴

ALBANIANs are generally recognized as the oldest inhabitants of Southeast Europe. They are the descendants of the Illyrians, the core pre-Hellenic population that extended as far as Greece and Italy. During the six centuries that the Romans ruled Illyria, the Illyrians resisted assimilation and retained their legal norms, as well as their culture and language—both of which are distinctly different from their neighbors in Southeast Europe. Today’s Illyrians are Albanians who use the Roman alphabet; their neighbors are Slavs who use the Cyrillic alphabet. Albanians are Muslims, Catholics, and Orthodox Christians who have lived side by side in harmony for centuries.

The Kanun has been central to Albanian survival in the face of hundreds of years of occupation and genocide. As such, it is a form of collective memory, cultural identity, and resistance. Some of the customs described in the Kanun are believed to have originated in antiquity. They were transmitted orally and handed down from generation to generation, with input from a variety of authors. Ultimately, the text of the Kanun (the word that gives us the English “canon”) was attributed to Lekë Dukagjini, an Albanian prince who lived from 1410 to 1481. Educated in his native Shkodra, Albania, and Venice, Italy, Dukagjini emerged as a leader in the Albanian resistance to the Ottoman Turks, who invaded the Balkan Peninsula in the second half of the 14th century. Dukagjini was a contemporary and sometime compatriot of Gjergj Kastrioti “Skenderbeg”—the Albanian national hero and towering 15th century figure who fought against the Ottomans for 25 years and prevented them from overtaking Western Europe.

⁴Adapted from the account given to Norman Gersham by Alia’s son, Enver, Tirana, May 2004.

² Leonard Fox, Introduction to The Code of Lekë Dukagjini, translated by Fox from the Albanian text collected and arranged by Shtjefën Gjeçov (NY: Gjonlekaj Publishing Company, 1989), p. xix.

³Harvey Sarnet, Rescue in Albania. Reprinted by the Albanian American Foundation (Ossining, NY); originally published by Brunswick Press (1997), page 63.

Although Dukagjini continued the fight against Ottoman domination for a decade after Skenderbeg died of disease in 1468, he became best known for codifying the set of laws that came to be called the Kanun.

The late Albanian linguist Martin Camaj has stated that the “natural form of this unwritten law remained rooted in the spirit and memory of an ancient people forever in contact and conflict with the customs and laws of other peoples.” “The maxims of the Kanun,” he said, “were primary; they took precedence over all other laws.”⁵ This was illustrated dramatically during the 500 years in which Albanians resisted Ottoman Turkish occupation, from the 15th to the early 20th centuries. According to Syrja Pupovci in his introduction to the 1972 reprint of the Kanun, the preservation of the Kanun “was one of the most important elements in helping the Albanian people to maintain their individuality under Turkish domination.”⁶

WHEN the Ottomans invaded Albanian lands, Albanian society had a well-defined clan system and all Albanians were Christians—either Eastern Orthodox or Catholic. The Ottomans set out to destroy the clans through forced conversion to Islam and acceptance of Islamic law. Although mass conversions to Islam occurred in the 17th century, when Ottoman officials levied discriminatory taxes against non-Muslims, the Ottomans never succeeded in destroying either the Albanian clan system or the power of the Kanun. Conversion to Islam was nominal. Until today, intermarriage between Muslims and Christians is commonplace, and religion is rarely the basis of conflict, because religion is secondary to Albanian identity—individually and collectively. According to the Kanun, there is no “distinction between man and man. Soul for soul, all are equal before God.”

⁵Martin Camaj, Foreword to The Code of Lekë Dukagjini, op. cit., p. xv.

⁶As quoted by Leonard Fox in his introduction to The Code of Lekë Dukagjini, p. xvii.

THE individual who would ultimately codify the Kanun in writing was a Franciscan priest born in Kosova in 1874 named Shtjefën Gjeçov. Gjeçov was an ardent Albanian nationalist who participated in the 1912 uprising against the Turks, which began after a group of Albanian leaders declared Albanian independence in Prizren (in what is now Kosova) on November 28, 1912. No sooner did Albanians throw off 500 years of Turkish domination, than they found themselves battling Slavic incursion, beginning with the Balkan Wars of 1912-1913, in which half a million Albanians were killed or died of hunger and disease, followed by racism, forced assimilation, expulsion, occupation, and genocide at the hands of hostile Slavic regimes that would last in various forms until today.

That story is the subject of a separate article from this one. What is important to note here is the fact that, after the Balkan Wars, Albanians were unfairly and artificially divided. With the assent of the so-called Great Powers (Austria-Hungary, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia), Serbia annexed half of Albanian lands, including Kosova, and other parts were given to Montenegro and Greece. Only because of the intervention of then- U.S. President Woodrow Wilson was the State of Albania created in 1918.

In 1939, when Mussolini’s Italian fascist forces invaded and occupied Albania, the country had been a monarchy since 1925.

[I]NTERMARRIAGE BETWEEN MUSLIMS AND CHRISTIANS IS COMMONPLACE, AND RELIGION IS RARELY THE BASIS OF CONFLICT, BECAUSE RELIGION IS SECONDARY TO ALBANIAN IDENTITY—INDIVIDUALLY AND COLLECTIVELY. ACCORDING TO THE KANUN, THERE IS NO “DISTINCTION BETWEEN MAN AND MAN. SOUL FOR SOUL, ALL ARE EQUAL BEFORE GOD.”

EARLY ON . . . ALBANIANS HID AND PROTECTED JEWS ON THEIR OWN INITIATIVE AND IN AN UNCOORDINATED WAY. LATER, AS IT BECAME MORE DANGEROUS UNDER THE GERMANS, THE RESCUE OPERATION BECAME MORE ORGANIZED AND “NATIONAL LIBERATION COUNCILS” IN TOWNS AND VILLAGE WHERE JEWS WERE HIDING MOVED JEWS FROM PLACE TO PLACE—EITHER WITH FALSE PASSPORTS OR DISGUISED AS ALBANIAN PEASANTS.

The Italians were followed in 1943 by the German Nazis, who remained until they were defeated by the Allied forces a year later.

Early on, according to Apostol Kotani, the leading authority on the history of Jews in Albania and co-chair with Dr. Petrit Zorba of the Albanian-Israeli Friendship Society, Albanians hid and protected Jews on their own initiative and in an uncoordinated way. Later, as it became more dangerous under the Germans, the rescue operation became more organized and “national liberation councils” in towns and village where Jews were hiding moved Jews from place to place—either with false passports or disguised as Albanian peasants. Albanian officials passed some anti-Jewish regulations, but only to placate the Italians and the Germans; they never enforced them. When the Germans asked Albanian leaders to provide a list of Jews living in Albania in 1943, they refused.⁷ As American Jewish philanthropist Harvey Sarnier has observed in his Rescue in Albania, “the importance of Albania as a sanctuary is demonstrated by the fact that only 10 percent of the 70,000 Jews who were in the surrounding territory of Yugoslavia survived the Holocaust.” That being said, many Albanians just outside of Albania’s current borders under Nazi occupation in Kosova, Macedonia, and Montenegro hid Jews and provided them with false documents and safe transport into Albania.

IN the 50 years from World War II to the fall of the Berlin Wall, the history, culture, and reality of Albanians was either concealed or misrepresented by their oppressors. In Albania, Communist dictator Enver Hoxha subjected the country to 46 years of one of the most centralized and repressive totalitarian regimes that the world has ever known. Hundreds of thousands of Albanians were murdered and imprisoned until Hoxha died and the regime of his successor, Ramiz Alia, collapsed in 1991. Meanwhile, the Albanians living outside of Albania in what is now the former Yugoslavia were subject to anti-Albanian and repression under Marshal Tito.

⁷Apostol Kotani, “Acts of Heroism,” Illyria, #369 (New York, 1997).

Most of the Jews in Albania immigrated to Israel, as a result of the courageous efforts of Josef Jakoele and his daughter, Felicita, leading up to the fall of communism in 1991. (Josef, who was born in the historical community of Jews in Vlora that dates back to the 16th century, had been saved with his sister by an Albanian Muslim named Shyqyri Myrto.)

IN 1995, WITH THE HELP OF CONGRESSMAN LANTOS AND FORMER CONGRESSMAN BEN GILMAN, THE ALBANIAN AMERICAN FOUNDATION WORKED WITH THE U.S. MEMORIAL HOLOCAUST MUSEUM IN WASHINGTON, DC, TO ADD ALBANIA (PREVIOUSLY OVERLOOKED) TO THE “RIGHTEOUS AMONG NATIONS” SECTION OF THE MUSEUM.

BUT we might never have known the extent of Albanian efforts to save Jews during the Holocaust if it were not for the trip made to Albania in 1990 by Congressman Tom Lantos, a Holocaust survivor from Hungary, and former Congressman Joe DioGuardi, as the first U.S. officials to enter the country in 50 years. Seeking to ingratiate himself with Congressman Lantos, dictator Ramiz Alia presented never-before-seen archives containing letters, photographs, and newspaper clippings about Albanians who saved Jews during World War II. DioGuardi subsequently sent the files to Israel, where they were authenticated by Yad Vashem. In 1995, with the help of Congressman Lantos and former Congressman Ben Gilman, the Albanian American Foundation worked with the U.S. Memorial Holocaust Museum in Washington, DC, to add Albania (previously overlooked) to the “Righteous among Nations” section of the museum.

TODAY, three and a half million Albanians live in the State of Albania and another three and a half million live side by side on its borders—in Kosova, Macedonia, Montenegro, the Presheva Valley (southern Serbia), and Chameria (northern Greece), while yet another eight million live in the diaspora, primarily in the United States, Western Europe, Turkey, and Australia—having fled Slavic state-sponsored terrorism and later Communism within and outside of the State of Albania.

Although millions were imprisoned, tortured, and killed in the post-war era, Communist and Slavic efforts to suppress or destroy Albanian customs and the major precepts of the Kanun failed. What has continually allowed Albanians to define themselves after a history of being defined by their subjugators is the powerful ethical underpinning of the Kanun. It also is what made Albanians take on the role of saving Jews from the Holocaust, and powerfully illustrates the intimate interconnection between besa and religious tolerance that has been endemic to Albania.

In the 21st century, Albanians must begin to overcome the destructive psychosocial consequences of hundreds of years of occupation, racism, and genocide. At the same time, their story is not only one of subjugation but—as epitomized by their courageous behavior during the Holocaust—it is also one of resistance to oppression, religious tolerance, and a commitment to justice.

SHIRLEY CLOYES DIOGUARDI is the Executive Director of the Albanian American Foundation and a political analyst who has testified at several hearings on Southeast Europe before the House International Relations Committee. For more information, visit the website of the Albanian American Civic League and Foundation at www.aacl.com.

Letters

Honoring Countries that Saved Jewish Lives

TO THE EDITOR:

Your magazine frequently has many thoughtful, informative articles, which I very much appreciate. The January/February 2006 [issue] carried one of those excellent articles, entitled "Jewish Survival in Albania & the Ethics of 'Besa'" [by Shirley Cloyes DioGuardi]. Only one claim in the article seems inaccurate; the claim that Albania is the "only nation that can claim that every Jew within its borders was rescued from the Holocaust."

While the rescue of 2,000 Jews was a magnificent achievement, I have been impressed for years with the equal achievement of Bulgaria, where 50,000 Jewish lives were saved.

While Bulgaria had a pact with the Axis powers, Germany had representatives in that country, attempting to herd those 50,000 Bulgarian Jews into death camps. Those Jews were finally assembled for transport out of Bulgaria when an amazing assemblage of almost every institution and significant leader in the country mobilized to stop that transportation. This group of protestors included the church, legislative leaders, and the king.

The protestors were successful and 50,000 Jewish lives were saved and survived the German Nazi period.

As far as I can tell, every Jew within Bulgarian borders was rescued from the Holocaust.

I do not want to detract in any way from the heroism of the Albanian people, but only pay tribute to the decency of the Bulgarian nation.

MILFERD LIEBERTHAL
Emeritus Professor
Labor Education
University of Wisconsin

Madison, WI

SHIRLEY CLOYES DIOGUARDI responds:

I respond to Professor Lieberthal's letter with great reluctance, because I do not want to compare heroisms or to create a hierarchy of heroisms and sufferings in response to the extermination of the Jewish people during the Nazi Holocaust. Nothing can diminish Bulgaria's saving of its 50,000 Jewish citizens, while it had a pact with the Axis powers. Bulgarians throughout the world are to be applauded for what they did to rescue Jews during World War II, and also for working hard for many years as a nation to inform the international community about their role.

In any case, the assertion that Albania is the "only nation that can claim that every Jew within its borders was rescued from the Holocaust" is based on the fact that not one Jew living in Albania before World War II, or who made it there during the war was handed over to the Nazis. As Dr. Mordecai Paldiel, director of the Department for the Righteous at Yad Vashem, has stated, central to the uniqueness of the Albanian story is the fact that, "the persons saved were mostly not Albanian citizens, but Jews who had fled to that country when it was ruled by the Italians, and now found themselves in danger of deportation to concentration camps when the Germans took over, in September 1943." Paldiel and other scholars attribute this to the uniquely Albanian moral code of "besa" (about which I have written at length), which caused Albanians to even risk their own lives to save Jews. As a result, there were more Jews living in Albania after the war than there were before the war.

The records show that Bulgaria did not receive the distinction of saving every Jew because, while Bulgaria did not deport Bulgarian Jews, it did deport to the Nazi death camps 11,000 non-Bulgarian Jews in territory that it had annexed from Macedonia and Greece. In addition, Jews inside of Bulgaria were discriminated against, and after 1941 all Bulgarian Jewish men between the ages of twenty and forty were rounded up and sent into forced labor.

Nevertheless, the primary purpose of my article was not to establish Albanian "exceptionalism" during the Holocaust, but to uncover a buried history. The role of Albanians in rescuing Jews is virtually unknown in the West to this day, because it was concealed throughout fifty years of Enver Hoxha's Stalinist Communist dictatorship in Albania. The stories of Albanian heroism were also suppressed in the former Yugoslavia, where three and a half million Albanians have experienced torture, arrest, expulsion, and genocide for more than a century. My article was an attempt to correct a gap in the Holocaust literature and, in the process, to help garner support for protecting the lives of an ethnic group that is still in danger.

Ossining, New York

CONGRESS MONTHLY welcomes comments from our readers for possible publication in a future issue. Letters can be sent to us either by regular mail or by e-mail, at:

CONGRESS MONTHLY
c/o American Jewish Congress
825 Third Avenue Suite 1800
New York, NY 10022-7519

congressmonthly@ajcongress.org

CONGRESSIONAL FOREWORD

RESCUE IN ALBANIA

ONE HUNDRED FIFTH CONGRESS
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES
COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
WASHINGTON, DC 20515

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT OF JEWS IN ALBANIA

RESCUED FROM HOLOCAUST

Harvey Sarner

Rescue in Albania -- written by Harvey Sarner, an American Jewish philanthropist -- relates the remarkable stories of how the people of Albania risked their lives to save foreign and Albanian Jews during the Holocaust.

The accounts of how Danes and Bulgarians took great risks to save their Jewish fellow citizens are well known through historical studies and popularized docudramas. The equally compelling story of the courage and humanity of many Albanians during the dark days of World War II, however, is one that is unfamiliar to most Americans, and virtually no scholarly research has been done on this topic.

But this is a story that deserves to be told and a story about which we need to learn a great deal more. Harvey Sarner has performed an important service in bringing together these stories of the sacrifice and humanity of the Albanian people in preserving the lives of Jews.

This book also depicts many instances in which Albanians demonstrated their commitment to justice and peace. Earlier in this decade, the people of Albania shook off the shackles of communism and embraced democracy. They, however, did not have experience in the ways of democracy and the workings of a free market economy, and Albania has faced serious political, economic and social turmoil in the post-Communist era.

Beyond the borders of Albania proper is a significant ethnic Albanian population in the province of Kosova and in Macedonia. While these Albanians share the same language, culture, values and commitment to justice of their relatives who live within the boundaries of Albania, they have faced a far different situation in their own lands.

Albanians in Kosova have been denied the most fundamental of human rights. The autonomy, which they enjoyed earlier under the government of the former Yugoslavia, has been systematically restricted and destroyed under an increasingly nationalist Serbian regime over the past ten years. Albanians who seek to exercise their fundamental civil rights have been systematically arrested, beaten, and tortured, and more recently have been subjected to violent military action and ethnic cleansing by Serbian authorities.

Albanians in neighboring Macedonia have also faced discrimination. Attempts to open a university in Tetova with a curriculum taught in Albanian and attempts to raise an Albanian flag alongside the Macedonian flag in Gostivar were prevented by police action.

It is a tragic irony that the children and grandchildren of the Albanians who helped Jews in Albania to escape during World War II now face discrimination and violence in Kosova and Macedonia. It is important to understand the background of these Albanians, and it is for this reason we urge you to take the time to read Rescue in Albania. This is a compelling story, and one that all of us can benefit from reading. At the same time, we must commit ourselves to see that the children and grandchildren of the brave heroes whose story this volume tells do not become victims of the forces of evil and repression that in every age work to suppress human freedom.

Tom Lantos
Member of Congress
(California)

Benjamin A. Gilman
Member of Congress
(New York)

112TH CONGRESS
2D SESSION

H. RES. 812

Commending the Albanian people on the 100th anniversary of the declaration of their independence from the Turkish Ottoman Empire on November 28, 1912, and commending Albanians in Albania and Kosova for protecting and saving the lives of all Jews who either lived in Albania or sought asylum there during the Holocaust.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

NOVEMBER 15, 2012

Mr. ROHRABACHER (for himself and Mr. NADLER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs

RESOLUTION

Commending the Albanian people on the 100th anniversary of the declaration of their independence from the Turkish Ottoman Empire on November 28, 1912, and commending Albanians in Albania and Kosova for protecting and saving the lives of all Jews who either lived in Albania or sought asylum there during the Holocaust.

Whereas in 1934, United States Ambassador to Albania, Herman Bernstein, wrote that, “There is no trace of any discrimination against Jews in Albania, because Albania happens to be one of the rare lands in Europe today where religious prejudice and hate do not exist, even though Albanians themselves are divided into three faiths”;